Kristen S.: I second the link to ChorAmor. I've attended the webinars on learning audio and video editing, and you don't need any experience to participate. Also, you can do it all with free software!

James Wells: Also, Choralosophy is a nice podcast. https://choralosophy.com/

ATTENDEE QUESTION: "Where do people find the time? All this learning to do things we've never done before while we're still doing everything we've always done, usually means that everything takes three times as long as life becomes more challenging in many ways. Where does the time for all this learning and self improvement come from?" (Answered @ 50:00)

Beth Green: So as we close the main part of this session, you're welcome unmute yourself and say something out loud, or read up and down in the chat window, or head on out and will see you this evening. The bottom right is your escape if you are ready to go but we will hang out another 10 or 15 minutes until my son gets home. By everyone. See you tonight.

CHAT "After Hours"

Kristen S. You can attend Zoom meetings by phone - no computer needed - for those frustrated with technology.

Mary Scifres: You can also get on Zoom and hit "record" to create a video training to show people how to use Zoom. Start with your familiar face to introduce the topic and then go screen share to show them how to click around and use the resource.

Keith Dyer: We have started to offer our own church's geek service if someone wants technological help in their home

How to record Zoom: https://support.zoom.us/hc/en-us/articles/203741855-Cloud-recording

Marcie Samuelson: For zoom meetings, I've opened up a private zoom meeting to help them access and feel comfortable with trying that new thing without making them feel "stupid" which is essentially what the issue is with the older generation. Often, they don't get the new technology easily and don't want to admit those failures to others. That trust that you've already established will help make them feel successful!

Barbara Kelly: I have been having driveway karaoke/sing-a-longs for some of my neighbors who are missing their choirs. We have a lot of fun and it is great in helping to keep up our singing.

Debra Tyree: For children, look at Teachers Pay Teachers site. I found an Instrument Bingo game there and my kids played Instrument Bingo one night. I sent pdfs of different cards to the kids by email in advance. There are also Bible Bingo games on that site as well. Ton of music worksheets too.
